Christmas Miniature Pearl S. Buck

It was the night before Christmas. Sandy had done his best to sleep. He had gone to bed early and he had tried not to think about Santa Claus or the tree downstairs or his stocking hanging by the fireplace, or whether there would be a bicycle behind the tree. It was hard but he had tried.

"The sooner you go to sleep," his little mother had told him, "the sooner Santa Claus will come. You don't want to keep him waiting, do you?"

"On such a cold night, too," his big father had said. "His toes might get frost-bitten."

They had hurried him into the tub, they had scrubbed him fast and hard, laughing all the while, for he was six years old and on other nights he took his own bath. They had rubbed him with the red bath towel, red for Christmas, and buttoned him into his red pajamas, red for Christmas again. They had tossed him into his bed as soon as he had said his prayers and covered him up in his warm red quilt. When his father opened the window, the snow blew in.

"A white Christmas," his little mother cried and clapped her hands. She was still quite young, her yellow hair all curly about her face.
